EXTRACTS.

CHARGE OF THE HIGHLAND BRIGADE.

The following verses, written by a private in the 1st Battalion Gordon Highlanders, were printed the other day at Cairo for circulation in the regiment, and a copy has been obligingly placed at our disposal. "Sir Archibald Alison supported me very favourably, and with this judgment most of our comrades will be disposed, we think, to agree—

"Hark! my lad, old Scotland's plumes,
In triumph may old England boast;
And proudly may old England boast,
Her sons and brave and brave;
And proudly may old England boast,
Her sons and brave and brave;
Who never yet knew how
Struck terror to the rebel hearts
That heard their charging cheer,
Hark! hark! the Highland steel,
And hark! the Highland steel,
For Tel-el-Kebir was won!

"Twas on the evening of the Twelfth,
We formed up on parade,
And Alison, in words like these,
Addressed his brave Brigade,
My lads, he said, our foes are strong,
Their trenches wide and deep,
And far and near across the plain,
His heavy guns can sweep
So silently and silently,
Our way to-night will be,
And then, we dawn the morning light,
Upon them with the steel.

No cheer arose throughout the ranks,
For silence was the word,
But still their faces told
How deep their hearts were stirred;
And round their well-learned Captain's lips
The words that were to come,
Said plainer far than words could say,
I trust my brave Brigade.

Right well he knew his Highland lads,
And none could better do the work
Laid out for them to do.

And then commenced that silent march,
Across the desert sand,
No sound except the steady tread
Of low, half-lit candles.

A rest, and then once more on foot,
Still closer to the deadly trench,
Pressed on the thin red line,
New silence, silence as of graves,
If but their guns could find us now
"Would make a sweeping cheer."

At last rang out their bugle notes
Upon the moving air,
And in the gloom the rifle flash
Told us the time was near.

One instant pause to fix our steel,
One instant—only one,
And with a cheer that rent the air,
The Highlanders rushed on.

And soon their flashing bayonets quenched,
The living chain of fire,
Hark! the foremost trench is won,
The rebel hounds retire.

But onward, onward to the front,
Advance our Scottish sons:
You've yet to take his guns.

See how his cursed rebel shot
Amongst as plough the ground,
And still his ill-directed shell
Are bursting in our front.

Another charge, another cheer,
And stark his gunners lay,
While redly gleamed our bayonet blades,
All in the burning day.

And now, my gallant Highland lads,
The Victory is won!
Our Indian troops take up pursuit,
Your work is almost done.

See! how across the desert waste
In terror wild they fly;
Or, tramping on the blood-stained sand,
In midday heat they lie.

For Alexander's battery,
A double dose of the mortar,
O'er the tops of his hill-tops lie,
You're well armed to-day!

God rest the gallant souls that fall,
In that fierce and bloody fight,
While bringing British pink to bear,
Against the rebel might.

And though their friends and comrades grieve,
Still, glorious 'tis to tell,
For every Highland heart that still,
A hundred rebels fell.

And proudly will the Scotch recall,
The thirtieth of September,
Eighteen hundred and eighty-two,
Till, O Gordon, Prince of Highlanders,
Thine Empire, 1892—Glorious!

ANECDOTAL PHOTOGRAPHS.

SIR J. FAYRER, K.C.S.I.

When the idea was first mooted in the Prince of Wales making a tour in India, the Queen, somewhat alarmed at the project, commanded Dr. Fayrer to proceed to Omdurman, under the pretext of his medical duties, to see that the Prince's health was maintained. Dr. Fayrer had accompanied the Duke of Edinburgh as medical attendant during his visit to India in 1870, and had for many years occupied the important post of President Surgeon at Calcutta. He was also Professor of Surgery at the Medical College of Calcutta, a Fellow of the Calcutta University, and a member of the Senate of the University. He had attained the highest eminence in his profession, was the author of several medical works, surgical and otherwise, founded on his Indian experience, and was, perhaps, the best living authority on all sanitary questions relating to the climate of British India.

As is now well known, Dr. Fayrer succeeded in allaying the Prince's fears, and the tour in India, which was at first intended to be a short one, was extended over several months, was duly accomplished. Dr. Fayrer's post of medical attendant involved grave responsibilities, the more especially as the trip was undertaken mainly owing to his representations as to the minimum of risk incurred. Fortunately, the Prince suffered no ill effects from the climate, while Dr. Fayrer gained the esteem and friendship of his Royal charge. Upon the termination of the expedition, Dr. Fayrer received the distinction of being created a Knight Commander of the Star of India.

But this was not the first occasion that Dr. Fayrer's name had been brought prominently before the public. For many years previously he had enjoyed a wonderful reputation in India, both as a successful surgeon and as a naturalist. In fact, Dr. Fayrer's career may fairly be described as distinguished almost from its commencement.

He was born at Plymouth fifty-seven years ago, and was appointed at an early age to the rank of ensign, and afterwards to the rank of lieutenant. He was subsequently present during the insurrection at Rome, where he had further opportunities of acquiring experience in his profession. In 1850 he was appointed to the medical service of the East India Company, and shortly after his arrival in India he was attached to the Field Hospital of the Burmah Expedition. He served with distinction during the taking of Rangoon. His courage and coolness under all circumstances, and the marked ability he displayed in the performance of his professional duties, were brought to the notice of the Marquis of Dalhousie, the Governor-General, who acknowledged his services in an autograph letter, and appointed him President Surgeon at Lucknow.

Dr. Fayrer's name will always be remembered in connection with the memorable siege of Lucknow. He was a member of the Council of War convened by Brigadier-General Sir Henry Lawrence for the purpose of deciding whether the Residency could be defended, and he was one of the chief persons, and sixteen men were killed and forty wounded during the defence. His eldest son, then an infant, was struck by a bullet while in his mother's arms, but he was afterwards rescued by Dr. Fayrer, who was subsequently present at the relief of Cawnpore by Lord Clyde, having taken part in a forced march of thirty miles in order to reach the beleaguered city. He was honourably mentioned in Sir John Lubbock's despatch from Lucknow, and received the thanks of the Government of India for his services during the siege. He was also promoted to the rank of surgeon by brevet, was allowed to count an additional year's service, and was nominated honorary surgeon to the Queen's army.

During his residence at Calcutta as President Surgeon, Dr. Fayrer had medical charge of the Mysore Princes. For many years he enjoyed a wonderful reputation as a consulting surgeon, and was practically the leading medical authority in India. He also achieved great distinction as a naturalist, and his book on the "Therapeutics of the Indian Fauna" is a classic. This exhaustive and able work was the outcome of many years' patient and laborious investigation into the action of cobra poison, and the baneful effects of snake bites. The shocking mortality which prevails among the native population of India from these causes, and Dr. Fayrer's attention, and indeed him to make a careful study of the reptiles of the country. He conducted a series of interesting experiments with the view of finding an antidote for cobra poison, and though his efforts in this direction have not been completely successful, yet the result has been distinctly beneficial.

But Dr. Fayrer proved himself a practical philanthropist in many useful ways besides that above-mentioned, and was constantly seeking to ameliorate the condition of the natives. The extraordinary loss of life and property occasioned by carnivorous animals was one of the subjects which called his sympathies, and he collected startling statistics in order to impress upon the Government the necessity of taking effective measures to minimize the evil. For his own part, Dr. Fayrer did his best in every possible way to further this desirable object. He is a keen sportsman, and while not declining smaller game, he made the tiger his especial quarry. His tastes in this direction led to his writing an extremely interesting little work of a quasi scientific character, entitled "The Royal Tiger of Bengal," which contains much valuable information about the majestic brute, besides some exciting experiences.

From the fact of Sir Joseph Fayrer having been selected to attend upon Royal personages on two occasions, it might be imagined that he is a somewhat of a courtier. Far from this being the case, however, Sir Joseph is a simple, unadorned, bluff, outspoken, modest man, reminding one of a sailor both in manners and appearance. He is rather below middle height, with a strongly-built, broad-shouldered figure, a very intelligent face, and a singularly unassuming manner. He is a most interesting man to talk to, especially on his favourite hobby of natural history, but he never strays either his knowledge or his varied experiences. The secret of his great popularity lies in the kindness of heart and the sturdy independence of his character.

Sir Joseph Fayrer finally quitted India in 1874, and succeeded Sir R. Martin as President of the Medical Board of the India Office. He has settled down quietly to private practice in London, but he still indulges his sportsmanlike propensities by annual visits to Dunrobin and elsewhere, and is a constant frequenter of the Zoological Gardens. On one occasion he was invited by a member of the snake-house at that institution to inspect a new cobra which the Society had recently purchased. Sir Joseph at once pronounced the reptile to be no cobra, but an excellent specimen of the ophiophagus, the only snake of its kind in captivity, and consequently, the most valuable in the Gardens. The Society, therefore, strove to the fact that they had made an extraordinarily cheap purchase.

Besides his war medals, Sir Joseph Fayrer has decorations galore, including several foreign orders, but of all his honours, that which he esteems the most is his M.D. degree of Edinburgh. He is a prominent member of several learned and scientific societies, both at home and abroad. He is also an Honorary Physician to the Queen and the Prince of Wales; physician to the Duke of Edinburgh; and to the Secretary of State for India in Council; President of the Indian Medical Board; one of the Members, representing India, of the Army Sanitary Committee; and a member of the Senate of the Medical School at Netley. He has several sons, a charming wife, and is a happy and contented man.—Truth.

MADAME NILSSON AND THE TENOR. As is now well known, Dr. Fayrer succeeded in allaying the Prince's fears, and the tour in India, which was at first intended to be a short one, was extended over several months, was duly accomplished.
